It may be argued on the other hand that the barracks and docks and other buildings and plant thus paid for out of capital last for many years, and that therefore it is more reasonable to spread the cost over a considerable period instead of charging it all to one year. This would be a very good reason if these works were of an altogether exceptional character. But as a matter of fact the British Government has always to be building docks and barracks; it has always to be laying fresh telegraph wires, to be enlarging post offices, law courts, and prisons. If the Government were run as a commercial concern all these forms of outlay would properly be treated as capital expenditure, and charged to capital account, and would gradually be written off by successive depreciations. It is, however, impossible to treat all the departments of the Government as commercial businesses. The Post Office might indeed be so treated with great advantage to the country, but this would necessitate the complete separation of Post Office accounts and administration from the other departments of the Government. Such services as those rendered by the Law Courts, by the Home Office, the Board of Trade, the Local Government Board, and by the Army and Navy, cannot be judged by ordinary commercial standards. They must be treated as the head of a household treats the various items of his domestic expenditure. He considers how much he...
