The largest Fig. 77.4.--Leaves of a tropical water lily (Victoria regia), growing in Lincoln Park, Chicago. leaves are found in the tropics. Banana leaves are often eight feet long, while palm leaves are just as large though of different shape. The more severe the climate, the smaller, in general, leaves tend to be. Thus it appears that small leaves, in general, are an advantage to plants which have to contend principally with the elements, while large leaves, in general, are an advantage to plants which have to contend principally with one another. In other words, small leaves go with severe climates and larger ones with mild climates. Can you think of any possible reasons for this? In our own climate large leaves are more frequent in shady places than in sunny places. You find them in damp woods where...
